

PLAN YOUR OWN ADVENTURE

Students have the flexibility to choose between in-person and online classes, allowing them to tailor their educational experience to fit their lifestyle. The program offers two distinct pools of electives—Methods and Processing and Content—which allow students to customize their course selection based on their personal interests and career goals. This flexible approach gives students the opportunity to design a program that aligns with their passions, whether they are focused on research methods, program design or specific health topics. By selecting courses from both pools, students can create a well-rounded education that prepares them for a variety of career paths in community and public health.

WHERE DO COMMUNITY AND PUBLIC HEALTH GRADUATES WORK

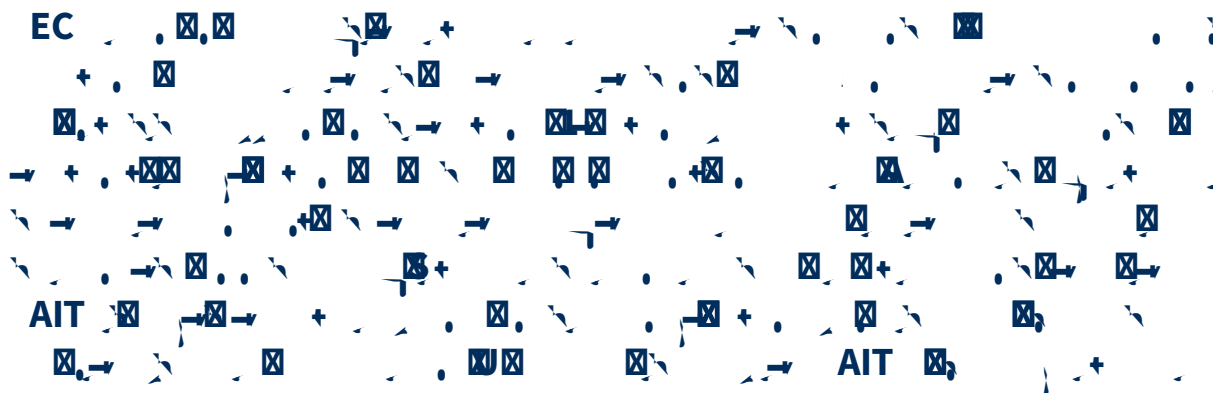

Graduates are prepared for careers in the assessment, administration, design, delivery and evaluation of health and wellness programs in a variety of settings, including business, industry, acute care, post-acute care, nonprofit organizations and government agencies.

FUTURE JOB TRENDS

According to the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics, jobs across several health-related professions are projected to grow by 17 to 32%.

ADMISSION

There is no application process to declare the Community and Public Health major. Students may declare the major upon entering the University or change their major at any time. Once in the program, students will be required to complete the prerequisite courses for the major.

Students will work closely with an advisor to determine an individual schedule.
